jpg image accompanying it, it's almost impossible to know whether this was a real crime or a fake one. Many of the real crimes that dot MySpace aren't newsworthy, and as of January 2008 there were more than 100 such user-posted items, including five that claim to have been committed by the actress Lindsay Lohan, 23, whose real-life troubles were a recurrent topic on MySpace. The number of such fake stories was ten times greater than real ones, and on at least one occasion a fake story about a sex crime may have come true. A few months earlier, a Wisconsin woman, believed to be in her late twenties, had allegedly kidnapped a young man and threatened to shoot him if he called the police. She allegedly left her victim in a forest near the town of Beloit, prompting one news site to declare the story "MySpace-style". One of the sites' moderators later claimed that he'd taken down the post when the story was supposedly proven false, after which a third party expressed doubts about its veracity. Even so, the link to the purported kidnapper's MySpace page was still live when this story went to press. Like many victims of internet hoaxes, Lohan's greatest notoriety probably stems from the number of people who chose to make unflattering comparisons between herself and Jesus, as well as between herself and the Virgin Mary. The former is a fairly common Internet meme; the latter, however, was only being used by the "MySpace-style" sites in the wake of the Mary-Jesus controversy that had begun with something similar a few months earlier. The comparisons were accompanied by photographs of Lohan, who shared a photoshopped photo of herself with her actual head on the body of Jesus. The controversy was no doubt orchestrated, but it began on a forum dedicated to Marilyn Manson fans, where a user posted a link to a MySpace site in which a user said that he had been raped by two angels. The site was, in turn, linked to by the larger Mary-Jesus controversy, which in turn was featured by a leading newspaper. In a 2002 article for The Village Voice, Lohan discussed the problems with the Mary-Jesus comparison in more detail, and also discussed the "Angelina" problem, claiming that her image was stolen from the MySpace page of a porn star named Angelina Sinn.
